Tariro means 'hope' in Shona, one of the two main languages of Zimbabwe

We are a small grant making charity based in the UK that raises money to support orphans or young people in Zimbabwe whose one parent can't look after them anymore.

We fund projects supporting between 45 and 50 young people who need our help and support in four centres in Zimbabwe through models which suit the individuals; supporting them through school and then with further education or practical projects until they are able to stand on their own feet, as a parent would.

Tariro gives these children and young people hope when they have had none, it gives them a reason to live, and helps them to thrive.

Money is sent out to the projects that Tariro supports in Zimbabwe and one of our trustees goes there regularly to see how it is spent.

The idea for Tariro started in 2009 when two Zimbabweans; Phillip Mutasa and Father Nicolas Stebbing CR, along with an English student, saw the need to help particular children in Zimbabwe.

First, a house in Harare where several teenagers could live was established as the Tariro Youth Project, an independent charity run entirely by Zimbabweans. Then we encouraged a group at Penhalonga to be organised and watched over by some Sisters. Soon after that two small projects began in Chipinge and in Shurugwi, near Gweru.

These three groups outside Harare are now overseen by a charity in Zimbabwe called the Tariro For Young People (TFYP). The children looked after by TFYP live with relations or go to a school where they can live-in, but the Sisters and trustees of TFYP make sure they have all they need to go to school.

Over the years the projects we support have found it is not enough just to focus on school fees alone. So the projects help in other areas:

- Some children go hungry because there is no food at home—they try to provide them some food at school.

- Teenagers need clothes to give them self respect and help them fit in with other young people.
- Girls especially, but boys too, need toiletries and such things to keep themselves clean.
- Many need counselling as no one has talked to them about their departed parents, the fact they were abandoned as children, or about the complex life that they will enter into once they leave school.
- Having someone to show their school report to and connect with their class teacher, gives them a huge boost in morale.

The projects we support have found they respond really well to this kind of attention. Their school work improves. They become happy relaxed young people.

They begin to hope for a future.
